Fact	Detail
Population	1,800, busy with crews and market hands
Who rules	Harbormaster Tovin, by charter and control of the moorings
Defence	A harbor watch patrols the piers; a chain can close the inner inlet
Trade	Builds fishing boats, buys grain and rope, sells fish, salt, and salvage

Arrival

Broad wooden docks reach across water so clear you can count the stones beneath the moored hulls. Each pier is built differently—some on round pilings, others on old ship timbers—and several boats creak at their lines. At the harbor's far end, Sennari's shop stands on stilts above the tide, its blue shutters visible between the masts.

Notable Places

Place	What's there
Sennari's Sundries	A stilted shop of charts, lamps, and ship parts, with a narrow stair down to the water
The Split Oar	A dockside inn where crews trade berths and argue over whose boat draws less water
Three-Pier Market	Fish stalls, rope sellers, and a covered table where cargoes are weighed
The Keelwrights' Yard	A boatyard where hulls are built upside down beneath a roof of woven reeds
Tideglass Chapel	A low shrine with clear windows set at water level, where sailors leave copper hooks
The Bell Buoy	A harbor marker whose bell carries across the inlet, even in thick fog

Who's Who

Mira Tallow, keeper of the Split Oar, wants a reliable crew to take a sealed crate upriver. She wipes the bar with the same cloth between every customer and speaks in clipped questions.

Jori Fen, a net-mender at Three-Pier Market, wants someone to prove the harbor marker has been moved. He knots scraps of blue twine around his wrist and lowers his voice whenever Sennari's shop comes up.

Dema Coil, a salvage broker, wants to buy any cargo found east of the Bell Buoy before the watch can claim it. She rolls a coin across her knuckles and calls every wreck an opportunity.

Rumours

Roll when the party shares a drink with a working sailor or helps unload a boat at Three-Pier Market.

d6
1	Jori Fen says the Bell Buoy rang twice last night, though no boat came through the inlet.
2	A crew at the Split Oar swears their keel scraped bottom in a channel that was deep the week before.
3	Dema Coil is paying well for crates stamped with a little blue hook, and no one can say where they came from.
4	A boat from upriver tied up at Sennari's shop after midnight, then left without its lanterns lit.
5	The Keelwrights' Yard has repaired three hulls with the same fresh gouge along the starboard side.
6	Someone at Tideglass Chapel says copper hooks vanish from the shrine whenever the tide runs out.

Secret

DM ONLY

Sennari pays Dema Coil to shift the Bell Buoy and guide chosen boats into a shallow cut east of the harbor. The resulting groundings let Dema claim their cargo as salvage, while Sennari quietly buys the best pieces. Jori noticed the buoy's anchor chain has fresh tool marks, but has not yet found proof tying the shop to the wrecks.
